The great difference which characterized the political actors of that period, and gave tone and consistency to the peculiar sentiments of the two parties, arose out of the views respectively entertained by them as to the powers of the federal government under the constitution, and the fundamental principle of the capacity of the people for self-government. One party, headed by Alexander Hamilton, desired immense powers to be vested in this government, and, as a necessary consequence, rejected the idea that the great body of the people were capable of self-goverment. In accordance with these principles the sovereignty and powers of the respective States would be curtailed to the extent of the enlargement of powers made in favor of the federal government; and that party has ever since attempted to assume and to acquire for this government, by a latitudinous construction of the language of the constitution, powers not expressly granted by that instrument. The other party, led by Thomas Jefferson, was in favor of reserving to the States...
