Excerpt: .This sub-retinal space becomes filled with albuminous fluid. Should the growth be situated close to the macula the vision will be profoundly affected; if placed in the peripheral part of the choroid a large detachment may be present without the patient knowing much about it. It is possible for a small detachment to exist for a long time without producing much defect of vision, but suddenly it becomes much larger, and this may be the first time the patient has noticed anything the matter with the sight. Ophthalmoscopically the detachment occurring with a neoplasm has usually a rather solid look, and the retina is seldom seen to wave about. Often the venae vorticosae are enlarged, and then large vessels are seen leaving the eyeball and running across the outer surface of the sclera. It is always well to carefully examine the situation where vessels leave the eyeball. Sometimes small black patches are seen here which really are portions of the growth. If a solid growth occupies a large portion of the interior of the eyeball it might well be expected that the intraocular tension would be increased, and it sometimes is. However, it is of no use to wait until the tension rises before diagnosing a sarcoma, because in many cases it is never raised at all, and valuable time may thus be lost. It is a curious fact that growths affecting the choroid only are far more apt to produce increased tension...
